DAVID SEDARIS

April in Paris

"April in Paris" portrays the author as contemplative over nature documentaries he watched on TV. He laments how obsessive viewers tend to care about the well-being of people's pets during natural disasters more so than the human beings involved themselves. Sedaris recalls Hurricane Katrina and how TV watchers wept over all the dead dogs and cats lost to flooding but not their owners. He then devotes time to dissecting a nature show about Canada in which the camera were anthropomorphized and their plight made to echo a human-like emotional landscape.

One day in his French countryside cottage, Sedaris watched as a spider devoured a trapped fly. Fascinated, David studied the spider more closely, discovering she was a Tegenaria by species' name when he looked up the information. Soon, Sedaris named her April and was completely hooked on her.

It's Catching

In "It's Catching", David, the narrator, recalls a Christmas dinner in which participants shared horrific stories of commensurable parasites, each new story more gruesome than the previous round. The narrator listened to the stories about germs on shopping cart handles, hotel bedspreads, and other lurking social-breeds and remembered when he caught crabs in his youth after buying a used pair of pants and not cleaning them prior to wearing them.

High, the narrator's lover, remembered when a garment worm formed a welt on his leg and then released a parasite from the wound upon hatching. Maw Hamrick, High's mother, also experienced a similar affliction and horrific outcome on her own leg. David's sister Lisa was diagnosed and paroled, secretly wondering if Maw Hamrick was still rampant with germs from parasites.

Buddy, Can You Spare A Tie?

"Buddy, Can You Spare a Tie?" Details the author's less than sartorial splendor when it came to dressing throughout his life. He recalls how his favorite flat-ironed costume as a child was to dress as a hobo, because he felt that anyone best summarized his approach to clothing. The character, a 1400's worker he owned that was deliberately distressed by designers to look old and ripped-up, as well as a pair of flat shoes he called his Green shoes. He wished that he had purchased an entire closet full of the distressed down shoes, as he liked the way they fit his fat feet.

Asia Trail

The Smithsonian National Zoo panda exhibit is the largest and most advanced of its kind in the world.

Asia Trail is home to the Smithsonian's National Zoo's most famous residents: giant pandas. Tian Tian (adult male), Mei Xiang (adult female), Bao Bao (juvenile female), and a male cub named Bei Bei. Live view into the first giant panda nursery at the Zoo in 1972, national care staff and Smithsonian Conservation Biology Institute scientists have studied giant panda biology, behavior, breeding, reproduction, disease, ecology, and habitat in order to advance conservation efforts around the world. For those that can't see the pandas in person at the David M. Rubenstein Family Giant Panda Habitat, online visitors can catch a glimpse on the Panda Cam, sponsored by Ford Motor Company Fund.

Red pandas. Asian small-clawed otters, clouded leopard, fishing cat and sloth bears are the other residents along Asia Trail. Visitors can see sloth bears because up waterfalls from artificial terraced meadows, watch fishing cats wade into pools, and observe Asian small-clawed otters scurry from the banks of a shallow stream to a floating waterwheel.

Meet The Animals

The fishing cat exhibit enables the Zoo's cats to hunt for prey exactly as they would in the wild. Walking into the shallow end of the pool, the cat tugs the water's surface. Once a fish approaches, the cat dives into the water to get its meal.

The David M. Rubenstein Family Giant Panda Habitat is home to four giant pandas: Tian Tian (adult male), Mei Xiang (adult female), Bao Bao (juvenile female), and a male cub named Bei Bei.

A pair of fishing cats named Lok (male) and Electra (female) live on Asia Trail.

Three sloth bears live on Asia Trail—a male named Hank, and two females named Hana and Rami.

A female clouded leopard named Mook lives on Asia Trail. The Zoo's Asian small-clawed otter family members include parents Chowder (male) and Cementine (female), as well as their six offspring.
